It existed between 1997 and 2009, and they were asked to close shop on the 18th of December, 2009. The proposal was to replace the store with a free art exhibition. Sophie Grigson was born in Moscow, Russia in 1953. She was raised in the United Kingdom from where she went on to the University of Nottingham to study Pharmacology, graduating in 1977. Sophie began tutoring to support herself, at first by teaching senior citizens to read and write. Later on she became a well known author. One of her books, The Language of Food, was even voted as one of The Guardian's ten best food books of all time. Her idea was to bring back the best practices of the past in order to make food healthier. The most famous example of this is "Drink your veg". It was originally intended to be a recipe book, but was so popular it went straight into publication as a series of easy-to-read articles. The recipes were collected and edited into a single book and published in 2003 under the title "The Wartime Cookery Book". This book was the first of a series of cookery books written by Sophie. Sophie founded Sophie Grigson's alternative in 1997. The original store was in Oxford, England, and it was well known for its alternative, and surprising selection of interesting and unusual food. It was the place where most of Sophie's ideas came into fruition. The library of books, and journals were all about cooking and healthy eating. If any food was in the store, then it would have been left so that the current display had a coherent message on display. If people wanted to order food or anything else they would have a menu on their table. Sophie always operated her store by the principles of scarcity. She often baked her own bread for the cafe, and also ordered her products from her suppliers. They used to sell coffee roasted on site, as well as tea and other baked items. Most days of the week there would also be a full cooked breaky buffet, which was always
